

Bebo goes live with snowboarding doc

Thursday, 06 March 2008

More news from Bebo, the social networking site, which is making a name for itself with some innovative online TV shenanigans

The site has teamed up Oakley to produce Conquering Dreams - a documentary about snowboarding. During the production of the doc, daily rushes will posted up on the site for all to see.

Although Bebo is screaming that this will change the face of broadcasting and all that sort of stuff, what we will essentially have is raw footage of the doc being filmed.

So not live at all then, but sounds interesting nonetheless.

â€œConquering Demonsâ€•, which goes into production this week, will follow British champion snowboarders and Oakley team riders Scott McMorris and Tyler Chorlton on a journey of discovery as Italian filmmaker Carlo Mancini investigates the â€œpsychology of fearâ€• in extreme sports athletes. Â Â

Bebo users will be transported into the inner circle of professional snowboarding for the first time through daily broadcasts from the athletesâ€™™ training base in the French alpine resort of Morzine, near Geneva.

The film will show the unedited reality of life as a pro snowboarder and introduce two top riders to an alternative style of filming and personal examination.Â

The production will also utilise the tools of social networking to interact with viewers in other innovative ways. For instance, fans will be able to email the snowboarders and the filmmakers and interact with other fans during the filming process.

First-time filmmaker

Mancini will attempt to psychoanalyze the athletes, both pre- and post-performance. Meantime, all the on the slope™ action footage for the Conquering Demons™ will be provided by Tim Warwood and Adam Gendle of Lockdown Projects, snowboarding and freesports production specialists, based in London.

Bebo™s move into documentary production follows the success of its foray into scripted drama. The first series of online drama KateModern attracted 35.6 million episode views across its run, while series two has had 5 million views to date. A second online drama, Sofia™s Diary, premieres on Bebo next month.
